

PLANE HEARD OVER WESTERLY COAST OF IRELAND TODAY

May Be One of Two Trans-Atlantic Craft, Believed Well Over Ocean

NO OFFICIAL REPORTS

Race Between Boardman-Polando and Herndon-Pangborn Interests Nations

LONDON, July 29.—(INS)—An airplane of unknown identity, possibly either of the American trans-Atlantic planes striving for long-distance records, was heard passing near Valentia, Ireland, today, according to the Western Union Telegraph Company.

The Western Union maintains a cable station at Valentia on the extreme westery coast of Ireland.

LONDON, July 29.—(INS)—The two American planes, the Cape Cod and the Miss Veedol, which were at last report racing across the Atlantic on non-stop flights to Istanbul, Turkey, and Moscow, Russia, respectively, were believed here early today to be more than two-thirds of the way to the Irish coast.

At an early hour officials at the Croydon Airport and at the Air Ministry said that they had heard nothing beyond the reports from Newfoundland points that both planes had set out over the sea.

News of the first trans-Atlantic air race, now on between Russell Boardman and John Polando in their Belanca plane, the Cape Cod, and Hugh Herndon, Jr., and Clyde Pangborn in the Miss Veedol, also a Belanca machine, stirred the British imagination, thousands of people will be on the watch today to catch a glimpse of the two planes which were scheduled to pass over Great Britain without a stop.

The flyers will have favorable weather over the North Atlantic, according to a forecast received by the Air Ministry today. Visibility was reported good, with moderate tailwinds helping the flights.

The two planes were expected to travel practically the same course for the first 3,000 miles and both should be over the Irish coast by noon. The courses will diverge over Central Europe where Herndon and Pangborn will steer northward for Moscow, the end of the first lap of a round-the-world flight in an attempt to beat the eight-day record of Post and Gatty in the Winnie Mae.

Boardman and Polando will continue southward to Istanbul in an endeavor to break the non-stop distance record.

One plane was sighted over Cape Race at 6.30 p. m., last night, Newfoundland time. Three minutes later the other plane was seen over Bay L'Argent and Ramea Island.

NEW YORK, July 29.—(INS)—Naval communications, large radio plants and shipping circles early today were without word of the two planes dashing across the Atlantic.

A check by International News Service revealed no ship at sea had reported any word of the giant monoplanes which left here yesterday morning, one carrying Russell Boardman and John Polando, Boston flyers, to Istanbul, Turkey, and the other manned by Hugh Herndon, Jr., and Clyde Pangborn, attempting a flight to Moscow as the first leg of a round the world flight in an effort to beat the time of Wiley Post and Harold Gatty.

The planes were last sighted off Newfoundland shortly before five o'clock (Eastern Daylight Time) last evening.

Commander Eckenwer and the passengers and crew aboard the Zeppelin received a warm welcome from General Umberto Nobile, the Italian explorer, and others aboard the Malgin. Owing to the weather however, the commander of the Graf decided to ascend as soon as mailbags could be unloaded for the Malgin and continue on the voyage of exploration of the Arctic.

The fifth, a young man, taken into custody, was returned to his parents' home in New York City following receipt of communication from the Missing Persons' Bureau in New York.

LINDBERGH'S NEW FLIGHT

Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh on their vacation flight to Japan and back are not out to establish new aviation records or to bring new glory to the Lone Eagle, yet they are attracting more public interest than the commercialized, publicity-seeking air exploits. They will get more publicity because they are indifferent to it, preferring seclusion to the limelight.

Their flight may seem a vacation or even a picnic to them, but it has all the earmarks of a real adventure to every last landlubber left behind. Their course takes them to Alakavik, Point Barrow, Nome, Kamchatka, Karaginsk and Petropavlovsk, names associated in every mind with adventure, heroism and achievement.

In some respects their flight is more ambitious than that epochal hop to Paris, but the Lindberghs consider it much less dangerous. Their airplane's course follows a line of safe landing places, gasoline stations and mechanics, whereas one forced landing on that Paris jump meant almost certain death.

Having taken them close to their hearts, the people are solicitous for the safety of Pilot Charles and Co-pilot Anne. They have the utmost confidence in their navigating ability, know that their ship and equipment are the best obtainable, yet they are a little fearful that some harm may come to them. They fly to the Orient with the best wishes of an entire nation for a safe return.

EVOLUTION

Many old people look back on the days of their youth through such rosy memories that they find it hard to see much that is as good in modern life.

Pioneers who traveled hundreds of miles through untracked wilderness are apt to think that there are too many mechanical devices now to help people escape walking. With so many convenient ways of getting about by trains, fast boats, motor cars and airplanes, they are afraid that the physical stamina of the nation will suffer for want of exercise.

This view seems natural enough to those who lived and walked through covered wagon days. By contrast modern methods of transportation seem almost like cheating, nature of muscular effort paid for distance covered.

The only answer is that game, gymnastics and duty or pleasure hikes must take the place of the exercise that was part of everyday life for pioneers. To judge by the physique and endurance of most aviators, that class of travelers, at least, has not gone soft from too much ease.

Everything indicates that the American people are now on the swing of the pendulum from physical inertia to physical activity. More are motoring and flying, but a great many more are swimming, hiking, mountain climbing, golfing, running and playing in other ways, requiring physical exertion. Omniscient nature is an ingenious doctor.

No more opportunity to get rich? Rats! There is no limit to the number of mixtures you can offer as medicine.

CHAPTER LII

MARY LOU had poured it all out to her on her visit, so youthfully, so abundantly, that Delight had had plenty of time to hide her astonishment, to wait. She had thought, shrewdly, that her own positive knowledge and Lorrimer's lack of it might possibly be a new and important card in the hand she held. But when Lorrimer came back and recognized her there by the boys' wood, she had been about to tell Mary Lou the truth. His return had silenced her. And then, with Mary Lou gone, with the situation quite changed, she had held her peace. For if he did not remember there was temptation in his lack of memory. It was something a clever woman might take advantage of, after all. But he had remembered. She discarded that card, therefore, as a fool player should. It was useless to her now.

"But I don't understand," Mrs. Lorrimer said helplessly.

Dr. Mathews came in. Peter announced him and went out, shutting the door silently, well aware that when the drama was being played out, worried in his loyal heart about Mary Lou, wondering where she had gone and why. He'd already seen the cook and been regulated with her backstairs dramatic recital of Mary Lou's entrance through the kitchen and her exit "without a word spoken, and that ain't like her, Mr. Peter!"

Mathews, entering, looked from Margaret to Lorrimer. Margaret indicated the other woman.

"Dr. Mathews—Miss Harford. This is Delight Harford, Dan," she said, unnecessarily, for he had recognized her at once.

Whereabouts Unknown.

The situation, as far as the ankle was concerned, was explained to the doctor. He gave certain orders, and Delight went upstairs to a guest room, where the orders were carried out. Margaret went with her, and Lorrimer, waiting below stairs, went out and talked to Peter and later invaded the kitchen to see Mrs. Jarman.

They could only tell him that Mary Lou had gone, that Mrs. Jarman had seen her "fly" through the kitchen "as if the devil himself was after her, sir," a suitcase in her hand, a hat "anyhow" on her head and a coat over her arm.

He returned to the library. He would find out where she had gone, someone would know. His mother perhaps. He realized with a tremendous shock that he knew nothing about this girl, her background, where she came from. Nothing, out her name. Yet for months he had thought he knew her very well.

His mother came downstairs, she said, briefly.

"Will you come up to Delight's room? I've asked her to stay, of course. She has telephoned to town and resigned from the company, or whatever it is they do. Dan says the ankle isn't broken but has been badly sprained. She'll be laid up for a little while. She wants to see you, or rather Dan does."

They went upstairs in silence, so much unspoken and unexplained between them. Mathews looked up cheerfully. He was sitting by Delight's bed in the pretty, cheerful room, sunk deep in a low chair. "I want to get this straight," he said. "I've heard the story now. It worries your mother, Lorrimer. This fixed idea you've had. But I have explained to her that it's—or something very like it—isn't unknown in medical annals."

Frustrated Desire.

"I wish you'd explain it to me," Lorrimer said, dully. "I can't understand myself. I was so sure—so sure, all these years! And then today—it came back—and I knew, I remembered. I think I must have been crazy!"

"No. You returned to the front terribly disappointed because your plans had gone astray. Youth can't bear being balked, being impatient and hating the verb 'to wait.' Immediately on your return you had a bad accident, you were ill, you came to yourself for a long time, you came to yourself as a prisoner. Much that had happened was wiped out. That is to say, your most ardent wish, the wish which had not been fulfilled, was fulfilled in the darkness of your subconscious mind. Your last conscious thought perhaps had been of Miss Harford here and the marriage upon which your state of mental and physical shock, the interruption to your plans faded from your conscious memory, the wish fulfillment of the subconscious took its place. Having ardently desired this culmination of your hopes, you came to believe the marriage had accomplished."

Mary Lou—"Doctor Mathews hesitated but went on steadily—"Mary Lou, in assuming the role of Miss Harford, brought nothing to your memory. You simply thought her the girl you had known, come back to you. She stirred no chord in you save to fix your belief that she was Miss Harford because of her accidental resemblance to her.

"But when you encountered the authentic girl memory returned. I can't explain it further. Probably no one could. But we doctors have seen many cases of this sort. It was not, however, an explanation which occurred to me before this, although I was frankly puzzled by your insistence upon this apparently unrecorded marriage, as was your mother. And now I think we'll leave Miss Harford to rest. She can have luncheon brought up here, can she not? It is long past the hour and I've had mine, but I'll invite myself to a cup of coffee if you persuade Mrs. Jarman to make me one while you people finish."

Mathews rose and looked down at his patient. She smiled up at him and then spoke to Lorrimer, almost timidly.

"I've brought you all into a dreadful muddle by coming back, haven't I? I didn't mean to come back. Not really. Lorry, perhaps you'll come and talk to me after I want to tell you why you couldn't find me—what happened."

He tried to smile.

"Of course," he said, and added, "Delight." But the name was strange to him now, it had an alien sound, a suggestion of mockery.

Luncheon, as far as Margaret and Lorrimer were concerned, was a farce. Mathews watched them, talked briskly of nothing much when Peter was in the room and later led the way to the library.

Lorrimer shrugged.

"There's only one thing to do," he answered. "If Delight will have me, I'm at her service, of course."

"Oh, Travers, no!" his mother said, in a little sob.

He turned to her, and put his hand over hers. "I can't help it, mother," he told her. "I suppose it's what Doc Dan here would call my old obsession." He smiled wryly. "I loved her; I asked her to marry me; I went through 10 years of my life with the fixed idea that she had. I—if she says no, I'm willing to fulfill what I consider an obligation."

He paused and said, slowly, "I don't know her any more, of course. It's as if she were a stranger. Funny, too, for—when that other Delight was here I had no such feeling about her. Yet she was a stranger! But this girl upstairs; she's been through a bad time. I can see that. I'd like to make it up to her if I can."

Forced Role.

Margaret was crying, very quietly. Mathews looked at her, shook his head warningly. She was saying—"My fault—all my fault. Travers, do you blame me very much?"

He replied, slowly. "No, I understand. You were forced into it by circumstances, by my old madness, by—oh, I don't blame you. But I can't understand her. Playing things part."

He thought of things he believed no one knew but Mary Lou and himself. Of her eyes when he had said she cared. A part, too? Just the role, just carrying on somehow?

Mathews said, steadily: "If your mind is made up, we have no right to try and dissuade you, not even your mother. And if you are being hard on Mary Lou Thurston in your thought—don't be. She was forced into this, too. Don't think she liked it! She's a very honest person. But she had to go through with it for your sake, and she did so. You owe her everything. You owe her, even, this final honesty, this clarifying of all the muddled, darkened issues. You owe to her even the strength with which to meet them, face them and to resolve them."

College Courses for Business Leadership Attract to Rider

TRENTON, N. J., July 29.—Unprecedented interest being shown by high school graduates in college courses designed to fit them for business leadership is taken by Dean John E. Gill, of Rider College, as an indication not only of an early improvement in economic conditions but of the maintenance of prosperity when it returns.

"During the year which comes to a close next month," said Dean Gill today, "we have had the largest enrollment in the history of Rider College. Advance registrations for the academic year which opens September 8 indicate that we may pass the 2,000 mark set for day and night sessions in 1930-1931."

The Rider dean attributes this condition to widespread realization that modern business has little room for the untrained worker and that the accountant, secretary or executive who has specialized under expert instruction stands the best chance of rising to the top.

"Young people," he asserted, "have become aware of the fact that the corner is about to be turned and that the outstanding industrial leaders of America will soon be seeking the college graduate who is prepared for a definite place in the business world."

State Senator A. Crozer Reeves, of Mercer County, will be honored with the award of an honorary degree at the Rider Commencement exercises here August 21. Mr. Reeves, who served as majority leader of the upper house in the last New Jersey Legislature, is a Rider graduate. John B. Kennedy, associate editor of Collier's Weekly, will deliver the commencement address, and more than 400 graduates will receive degrees and diplomas from President Franklin B. Moore.

Announcement was made recently that a new intramural program of athletics will be inaugurated during the 1931-32 sessions. Dean Gill de-

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S TRAVELS

Historically Correct Sketches
By CALVIN FADER

AMERICANS and friendly Indians often camped about the wilderness home of Lord Fairfax and from them Washington learned much. He was now attending Nature's university.

IN the old court house at the right, long since vanished and the site of which is now occupied by a department store, George Washington was appointed surveyor of Culpeper County, Virginia, after having passed a rigid examination by the president and masters of William and Mary College, shown at the left. This was his first formal appointment, and papers yellowed with age record how proudly he took his first oath of office at the age of seventeen.

State, and ever since has been under his guardianship. On application,

Americans on sight-seeing visits to the national capital, may see this symbol of the mighty authority of their government, among the exhibits in the Department of State.

Three times in our history it has been necessary to replace the great seal, as the result of wear. The first replacement occurred in 1841, when Daniel Webster was Secretary of State. On this occasion the engraver was guilty of a curious blunder. In place of the thirteen arrows that he long in one of the eagle's talons, he engraved only six. In 1884, when again it was necessary to engrave a new seal, this error was corrected and the seal became a slight enlargement and sharpening of the original design of the Continental Congress. In 1903 the seal was again renewed, in close adherence to the original Barton design, the authorities having decided that any change would break the historic continuity of this emblem of our sovereignty.
